midas is one of the world's greatest treasures. its location long forgotten, archaeologists have argued that the golden city lies anywhere from dominica to andalusia. sadly, despite many attempts to find it, the city's position remains a mystery.

if you doubt its existence, perhaps the many golden artefacts found over the years will convince you. scientists studying these invaluable objects argue they provide evidence of an as-yet undiscovered treasure. emma nickson, a world-renowned academic, explained, "clearly, these precious objects date back to an ancient, extremely wealthy civilisation. i believe they are remnants of the golden city." richard clifton, famous traveller and survival expert, further argues, "let's face it, there are loads of things we are haven't found yet. every year scientists discover new creatures on our planet, who's to say there aren't people and places waiting to be found as well?"

definitely the strongest evidence for the lost city's existence comes from accounts written by people who have actually been there. bartéz, the legendary 19th century explorer, wrote a journal entry in which he mentions visiting the lost city while his ship, yellow rosa, was being repaired.

april, 1807

i'd been hiking through the jungle for many hours with norrington today when we finally stumbled across it, the city of gold. floors, ceilings, windows, walls, everything made from the precious metal. oh, we could not believe our eyes! right away we stopped our haphazard climb and stared in wonder. enthralled by its beauty, we began to walk towards the mesmeric city, sharing with one another our good fortune to find such a paradise. suddenly, our musing was interrupted by..

this is all that remains of his entry and is the last surviving record of the city.
